

The Horroboos (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Horroboos It was the last night of the century and a number of us had gathered to witness the closing heart-beat of a hundred years. To while away the time until the ancient patients demise we began to tell stories, drawing on our imaginations so vigorously that in some cases it seemed that the faculty might never be quite elastic again. There was among us one who did not yield himself to our sprightly vein, who indeed, if we were to speak from his reveried air, hardly felt the bracing sallies of mirth which gathered into spirited gales in their passage from mind to mind. At length we bantered him on his taciturnity, voting that he too must lay a story upon the altar of laughter. Greyson! Greyson! cried several, whereupon we all shuffled our chairs making him the center. I am not a person of flaming fancy, began the gentleman thus importuned, and if you demand improvisation I shall humbly vacate the office of amusement to which you have elected me. Moreover, upon this of all nights of my life I am chilled with sombre memories which hold my mind in their unrelenting grasp. What I shall tell you is true - would it were not! - true even to the indelible language I shall repeat, and occurred ten years ago at this very hour.
